Hope,

I think you've picked a great topic in Facebook and its affect on social life now and in the future. Reading your outline I had some good thoughts and questions, so make sure to read my notes on your draft.

Another random thought I had: We're really the last generation to have a taste of social life before Facebook (and even then only barely, at least as adults). For everyone who comes after us, it will be a constant part of their social lives from high school—and maybe even middle or elementary school—onwards. In a way, we're most qualified to evaluate Facebook since we experienced life before it, during its birth and boom, and now as it's become a part of most people's daily lives. It's a unique set of experiences than no other generation will have. What I'm saying is, take advantage of the personal perspective you have from living through this time in history.

Anyway, I think you've got a great start here and it looks like you're going good places with it. Keep it up (and again, remember to read my notes on your draft)!

Socially,

John Pray
